All Disputes Between Employer and Employed Settled By a Board of Conciliation and an Arbitration Court.

The Industrial conciliation and arbitration act of New Zealand was passed in 1894, and several amendments were tory. There is no statutory precedent to this act in the world.

If the dispute is left to the board after taking evidence, the board may make a recommendation which, if accepted by the parties, is put into the form of an industrial agreement and has the force of law. comes law, but if rejected the dispute is carried to the court of arbitration.

This court consists of a president five horses and intending to few days ago, Clarence Boyce of Wind. who is a judge of the supreme court, and two members, one elected by the car on or about April 29, and is 1796. The piece is in excellent state workers' unlong. It has wide powers, workers' unions. It has wide powers, laws, apprentice laws and seamen's acts are also in force. The wages of laborers are about the same as with us, but skilled labor does not quite come up to our standard either as to quality or pay. The best theory that one can give for the success of the labor laws and to the observance of them is that all laws are respected in this country. They are created at the suggestion of the people. For instance, the Sunday closing act includes not only saloon keepers, but all shopkeepers, manufacturers and business and trade of every kind except those necessary to run the country. The masses know that the laws are made to be observed. All shops close at 6 p. m., and saloons must close at 10 p, m. week days; no back doors open. It is no business from the word close, The Hon, J. A. Millar, minister of labor, said recently, "If care is taken in the administration of our labor laws, I see no reason why the present satisfactory relations between employer and employed should not continue indefinitely." It would appear that the genuine reason to be ascribed for this unique situation is that the workers themselves, who mainly instituted this system, insist upon the laws being observed. The conciliatory board is not as popular as the court of arbitration. The dispute is usually carried direct to the court of arbitration and after a slight discussion is satisfactorily set-

This same and fair act has now stood successfully for twelve years, and it must be remembered that every single suggestion or amendment made for the protection of either the employer or employed receives the hearty support of both, provided it seems just.
